(CONCLUDED FROM FIRST PAGE.) for the amelioration of conditions, for the widening of opportunity and for the attainment of fuller rights, but, after all, the race problem is simply the sum of the problems confronting every black man, as they do every white man, and which every man must solve for himself. Brooding over wrongs, however real, revolting against conditions, however harsh, crying out against discrimination, however apparent—this in itself will not accomplish anything for the colored people of this country. If there is a race question in this country, there is just one way in which each individual colored man may contribute to its certain solution, and that is by resolving that his life shall be such that he shall command what is worth infinitely more even than the opinion of any other man, and that is his own self-respect; that he shall strive for his own advancement in knowledge, in judgment and in usefulness, and fight bravely onward toward a higher ideal of living and thinking. by Vonnenbruck. Beautiful as the morning, calm as a day in June, this beautiful ideal is the embodiment of all things perfect. Tall, slender and graceful, the utter abandonment of her attitude, and the sleepy, tranquil eyes, breathe of peace and contentment. The hair is long and rich and brown, framing a delicately tinted, classic face, and mingling with draperies which reveal wondrously beautiful neck and arms. It rests one to look at this beautiful picture. The softly blended tones give it a richness which delicately brings out the fine points and exquisite grace of the lovely face and figure.
